

Venezuela hospital makes its own masks to confront new virus

18 March 2020, by Fabiola Sánchez

A worker of the state-owned Concepción Palacios Maternity Hospital manufactures face masks in Caracas, Venezuela, Tuesday, March 17, 2020. Workers of the city's main maternity are preparing makeshift masks with disposable blue sheets to distribute to medical staff and other workers of the health center for protection of an eventual spread of the COVID-19 illness. The vast majority of people recover from the new coronavirus. (AP Photo/Ariana Cubillos)

Medical supplies of almost any sort are in short supply in Venezuela, so workers at a maternity hospital in Caracas are racing to confront the rapidly spreading coronavirus by making surgical masks, one by one.

Five workers have been holed up for days in the basement of the Concepcion Palacios hospital, hunched over sewing machines and transforming disposable blue paper sheets into masks for their 2,800 coworkers.

As of Tuesday, they had managed to turn out about 1,000 of the hand-sewn masks.

"They don't move from those machines," said supervisor Silvia Bolivar, one of the people who organized the project. "They eat and rest there until they get up in the evening to leave."

She said other hospitals have begun a similar effort to help fight the virus. It causes only mild to moderate symptoms, such as a fever or cough, for most patients, but can be severe for some people, especially older adults and those with health problems.

Venezuela recorded its first 36 confirmed cases of the coronavirus in less than a week as of Wednesday, and most health experts say the nation—already struggling with an economic crisis and widespread shortages, isn't ready for what's to come.

Hospitals are short of masks, gloves, medicines and sometimes even running water, according to health workers.

Workers of the state-owned Concepción Palacios Maternity Hospital manufacture face masks in Caracas, Venezuela, Tuesday, March 17, 2020. Workers of the city's main maternity are preparing makeshift masks with disposable blue sheets to distribute to medical staff and other workers of the health center for protection of an eventual spread of the COVID-19 illness. The vast majority of people recover from the new coronavirus. (AP rewritten or redistributed without permission.

Photo/Ariana Cubillos)

Workers of the state-owned Concepción Palacios Maternity Hospital manufacture face masks in Caracas, Venezuela, Tuesday, March 17, 2020. Workers of the city's main maternity are preparing makeshift masks with disposable blue sheets to distribute to medical staff and other workers of the health center for protection of an eventual spread of the COVID-19 illness. The vast majority of people recover from the new coronavirus. (AP Photo/Ariana Cubillos)

"We should have more safety, appropriate face masks, but we're in this emergency," said one of the workers, Yordania Mata, 34, as she took a break to rest her hands.

President Nicolás Maduro on Monday ordered the entire nation to stay home under a quarantine aimed at cutting off the spread of the new virus, calling it a "drastic and necessary measure."

Maduro blames much of the problem on U.S. sanctions, though shortages began long before those were imposed.

Facing the new pandemic, he said that "if some problem arises in some hospital, we have to resolve it. We don't have to try to turn it into a political issue but in cooperation among all."

© 2020 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast,

APA citation: Venezuela hospital makes its own masks to confront new virus (2020, March 18) retrieved 30 May 2022 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2020-03-venezuela-hospital-masks-virus.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.